Movement Deletion and Hold Reduction in ASL

Learn about research in phonetic reduction in ASL. Because ASL is richly complex, this specific skill is difficult to master for most educational sign language interpreters. The most basic signs that involve movement deletion and hold reduction are visible in vocabulary that are used in native signers, starting at four years old. Research findings compare students who attended a school for the deaf from K-12 to mainstreamed in a public school setting.

Presented in ASL

Jaime Marshall, MSW and MASLED, has over 10 years of American Sign Language teaching experience, training and mentoring student interpreters and professional interpreters. She is a faculty member at Appalachian State University in Boone, NC. Jaime attended NC School for the Deaf in Morganton, NC from K to 12 and matriculated at Gallaudet University with triple majors: Social Work, Psychology and Art History & Museum Studies. She also has two Master's degrees: Social Work and Sign Language Education. She has served on the NC Interpreter and Transliterater Licensing Board and continues to serve on the NC Association of the Deaf Board. Acknowledging her signing privilege and access to the Deaf Community since birth, Jaime is dedicated to paying particular attention to marginalized deaf and hard of hearing children as she strongly feels that is important that their physical, emotional, mental and spiritual well-being is valued and nurtured as a whole. A former residence of Washington, D.C. area of 15 years, Jaime now resides in Granite Falls, NC with her daughter, Scarlett. Jaime enjoys traveling with her daughter, restoring old furniture back to its natural beauty and gardening. Jaime is a strong advocate for Sign Language as a Human Right, she is a team member of Language First organization and can be reached at Jaime@Language1st.org.
